About the Authors

Kelly Faye Jackson, PhD, MSW, is an associate professor in the School of Social Work at Arizona State University. As a social worker and multiracial person, Dr. Jackson is committed to expanding the current knowledge base of multiracial identity through the dissemination of empirical research to help social workers and other helping professionals work more inclusively and responsibly with the growing population of individuals and families living multiracially. Her research examines the identity development and overall well-being of people of mixed racial heritage. Since 2008, Dr. Jackson has maintained regular involvement in local and national multiracial organizations, including serving on the executive boards of MAVIN, Mixed Roots Stories, and Critical Mixed Race Studies. She self-identifies as mixed black and white and resides in Phoenix, Arizona, with her husband and daughter. Dr. Jackson remains grateful to close family and friends who make it possible for her to affirm her identity as a multiracial woman of color.

Gina Miranda Samuels, PhD, MSSW, is an associate professor at the University of Chicago’s School of Social Service Administration and faculty affiliate at the Center for the Study of Race, Politics and Culture. For the past 20 years, her scholarship has explored issues of multiracial identity, relational permanence, belonging, and ambiguous loss among people who have experienced disconnections from their families, cultures, and racial–ethnic communities of origin. Her prior social work practice and current scholarship focuses on child welfare populations, including transracial adoptees and their families, youth aging out of foster care, and young people who experience homelessness. She uses critical–intersectional theories and interpretive methods of research to advance youth- and family-centric practices and policies in child welfare and social work broadly. Dr. Miranda Samuels is herself mixed race (black–white) and transracially adopted. She lives and works in Chicago but spends increasing amounts of time at her cabin in North Carolina with her husband and two dogs.
